State of Wisconsin
Department of Natural Resources
Madison

February 11, 1993

To the Honorable the Legislature:

Section 144.737, Stats., requires that the Department of Natural Resources provide a draft Capacity Assurance Plan to the Pollution Prevention Board, the Governor and the chief clerk of each house of the legislature at least 75 days before the final report is due to U.S. EPA, which for this submittal is May 1, 1994. The Department is also required to hold an informational hearing no later than 45 days after providing the draft. We have devoted significant resources to this effort, but due to problems with incomplete reporting data we will not be able to meet the February 15, 1994 submittal deadline. We anticipate transmitting a draft copy of the Plan to you by April 1, 1994.

You should also be aware that EPA changed the process for submitting Capacity Assurance Plans. Previously, the Plan was a comprehensive document containing both data reporting and policy directives for assuring that adequate hazardous waste management capacity existed. The statutory requirements discussed above were developed to allow for review and oversight of the policy implications of the Plan. The process is now divided into three phases, the first of which only covers data reporting. Since the Phase I submittal will not contain any policy statements, the delay in completing this portion of the Plan should not present any major problems. I also believe it would be prudent to postpone the informational hearing until we have a draft policy document prepared. At this point in the process we are unable to predict when that will occur.

Thank you for your attention in this matter. If you have any questions regarding this letter, please contact Paul Didier, Director of our Solid and Hazardous Waste Management Program at 267-6854.

Sincerely,
GEORGE E. MEYER
Secretary, DNR

JOINT CONVENTION

The assembly was called to order by the speaker.

The members of the senate arrived.

The houses went into joint convention.

Senate President Rude presiding.

SPECIAL GUEST

Senate President Rude introduced Jane Alexander, the Chairperson of the National Endowment for the Arts, who addressed the joint convention from the rostrum. Her remarks are printed below as requested by Representative Prosser by unanimous consent.

"Thank you for that kind introduction. I am delighted and honored to be addressing this Joint Meeting of the Wisconsin State Legislature, and your invitation to have me here clearly indicates the importance of the arts in the Badger State.

Right now, a world away in snowy Norway, athletes from all over the world are gathered for a festival of sport, that rewards excellence, dedication and achievement. The Olympics celebrate sport, and in a very symbolic way, the renewal of the common bond between people of all nations.

Here in wintry Wisconsin, we celebrate that same commonality of humanity every day. Some of the citizens of your state, I don't doubt, have cousins in Lillehammer, ancestors throughout Scandinavia. But the Wisconsin story is not limited to one cold corner of the world. Everyone has come to Wisconsin. In a recent publication called Passed to the Present: Folk Arts Along Wisconsin's Ethnic Settlement Trail, which was supported by the National Endowment for the Arts, there's a small map of the historic Green Bay road that shows the origins of settlers in the area.

There's 56 different organized ethnic groups in Milwaukee, and branching out along the trail, are German communities (at least eight different kinds), Dutch, Native American, French Canadian, Irish, African American, Danish, Hmong, Polish, Bohemian, Swedish and Icelandic -- to name but a few. The "Passed to the Present" publication accompanies an exhibition organized by the Cedarburg Cultural Center that highlights the folk art traditions of those various communities -- from the Freistadt Alte Kameraden Band to Xao Yang Lee, a Hmong weaver from Sheboygan.

The Olympics have nothing on Wisconsin. You celebrate the tapestry of American culture every day, in every community in this state from the Green Bay Road to the Red Cliffs of Lake Superior, from Madison to the banks of the Mississippi, from downtown Milwaukee to the Wisconsin Dells. You do so through the arts.

From its very beginning, Wisconsin has valued the cultural life of its communities. Over the past few years, however, the state has turned the corner of its responsiveness to the arts and how they serve the people of the state. In 1992, the Wisconsin State Arts Board, not only looked inward to assess the responsiveness of its state arts funding, but they went out into communities across the state to invite comments and thoughts from the general public.

Part of the process involved a series of town meetings to hear what artists, administrators, patrons, business and foundation leaders, educators, legislators and other public officials thought about cultural development in the state and what the state arts agency might do to chart a better course for the future of the arts. Hundreds of people attended those meetings, and their response was incorporated into a new long-range plan which has, I understand it, received strong support from this state legislature. On Wisconsin!

By listening to the people and their needs, the Wisconsin Arts Board is playing a large part in the renewal of our communities, of our country. President Clinton, in his State of the Union Address, called for an American renewal in economics, schools, values, and communities. The arts can lead the way in that renewal here in progressive Wisconsin and across the country.

Let me first address the arts and economic renewal. There's a case to be made right away about the current economic impact of the not-for-profit arts. A recent study by the National Assembly of Local Arts Agencies estimates that the not-for-profit arts in this country are responsible for over one million jobs, $790 million in local government tax revenues, $1.2 million in state tax revenues, and $3.4 million back to the Federal government in income tax revenue from an economy that can be described conservatively as $36.8 billion in direct expenditures along. As the report demonstrates, governments provide seed money that has a tremendous return. The arts do indeed mean jobs and more business.

But the non-profit arts play an even more fundamental and important role in the local and national economy. The arts are about people talented, creative and innovative people, and they are also the valuable resource to a growing economy. A recent article in The Economist stated:

...if American firms are to stay ahead, more of the same may not be enough. And the extra effort, paradoxically, may have to come as much from America's politicians as from its businessmen. The country needs urgently to renew and reorganize its investment in people...A country whose prosperity is based on creativity, flexibility and openness to change needs to equip its people accordingly.

Our prosperity has always been based on that individual creativity. In the future, according to that little girl on the MCI commercials on television, we will all be part of something called the information highway. Whatever that may ultimately become, one key issue emerges from the technological revolution that is occurring in the waning days of the 20th century. The big seven industries of telecommunications, software, entertainment, cable, broadcasting, publishing and consumer electronics will be the engine that drives the American economy, if it is not already doing so.

The research and development arm of much of the big seven industries is the non-profit arts sector. The arts are the training ground and crucible, for new ideas, new thinking. Take, for example, the film industry -- one of the most lucrative businesses dealing in intellectual property. How many filmmakers, writers, directors, actors, musicians, designers, and technicians received their training in the non-profit sector? Ken Burns, the creator of the epic "Civil War" series and the much anticipated series on the history of baseball, toiled in the relative obscurity of documentaries before receiving such critical and popular acclaim. Without the freedom to pursue his vision through grants from our sister agency, the National Endowment for the Humanities, he may never have succeeded.

Indeed, we may not have had many of the critical and commercial successes of the past generation had not the Endowments been quietly going about their business -- taking risks, funding people of vision. We afford our playwrights the chance to test their wings at regional theaters, our writers to follow their ideas, our designers to explore and research. For example, the Arts Endowment and its partners helped fund anti-earthquake devices that helped stabilize the Getty Museum. Now that's art with commercial consequences. We support those traditional artists, as I mentioned before, to preserve the cultural heritage of this country upon which all our future success rests. By supporting a climate of inquiry, we create a climate where our artists develop their talent, toughness and skills. Quite literally, many billions of dollars of our country's economic activity depend in part on the not-for-profit arts, and those arts, in turn, are dependent upon the network of public and private funders.

If we are to enjoy an economic renewal, we must strengthen our investment in creativity. That holds true as much in Wisconsin as it does across the country. What the arts are all about is not just creating more and better jobs, increasing the local tax base, attracting tourism and businesses, and spinning off indirectly economic impact. The business of the arts is creativity, and an investment in the arts means equipping our people to face the challenges of tomorrow.

Such an investment in our economic renewal requires a concomitant investment in education. The arts provide insights, perceptions, the capacity for imagination and creativity that can transform the nature and quality of our everyday life. By actively participating in and learning dance, design, drama, literature, music, and the visual arts, people gain the tools for knowing the world through our most basic, ancient and ubiquitous form of expression and insight.

The President of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, Ernest Boyer, has said: "Art is humanity's most essential, universal language. It is not a frill, but a necessary part of communication. The quality of a civilization can be measured by its music, dance, drama, architecture, visual art and literature."

If we do not teach the universal language of mankind, we cannot hope to give our children a complete education. If we do not encourage the imagination, we cannot hope to have creative children. If we do not learn the history of ideas, emotions and aesthetics, we leave out the very foundation of the "whole" human.

Because they speak to the spirit, and because they can benefit every child, every type of thinker. Howard Gardner, in his Theory of Multiple Intelligences, has identified seven discrete ways people learn and create themselves: language, math and logic, music, spatial reasoning, movement, interpersonal intelligence and intrapersonal intelligence. While schools must often structure curricula to work with students' linguistic, mathematical and logical strengths, an arts-based structure would include all seven ways of learning and thinking. This is a creative way of looking at how children learn, and creative and innovative approaches are the only way to solve the education crisis.

Beyond their intrinsic knowledge and skills, studies show the arts can:

- * provide greater motivation to learn;
- * increase attendance for students and teachers;
- * build bridges to the community;
- * engage students more fully in the learning process;
- * give teachers a sense of renewal and challenge -- especially when the arts are integrated with other subjects;
- * develop high-order thinking and problem-solving skills.

I'll use myself as an example of how an education that includes the arts produces results. I was a good student and enjoyed school, in general, doing well in some subjects, particularly mathematics. But it was through theater that I felt most alive in school. I learned more on the stage than any place else. I was motivated to excel, encouraged to believe in myself, and gained the skills necessary for a successful career. Where would I have ended up had I not the opportunity to learn about theater in school? What kind of person would I have become? it is nearly impossible to imagine.

All children should have the same opportunity I had. I don't expect that the world would become flooded with actors or over run with artists. What I would expect is that we could better educate our children and prepare them for the rest of their lives, if we tailor the way we teach to take advantage of the they learn. Short of setting up multiple curricula for multiple intelligences, the only way to teach a divers group of students is through a structure that is open to our human intelligences. That structure would be informed by the arts. The Administration's proposal for reauthorization of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act recognizes the contributions of the arts. The arts are important to excellent education and to effective school reform, and arts education should be an integral part of the elementary and secondary school curriculum.

Quite simply, we can no longer afford to ignore the arts. If we invest our resources in values, in spirit, in creativity and imagination, we will build those better schools as proposed in the President's GOALS 2000: Educate America Act. A vision without imagination will not come to be. I know that here in Wisconsin, the State Arts Board has made a solid commitment to arts education in what is one of the nation's best public education systems.

Hand in hand with education reform is a renewed commitment to our values and our communities. President Clinton asked us all to give our children a future:

"Let us take away their guns and give them books. Let us overcome their despair and replace it with hope. Let us, by our example, teach them to obey the law, respect our neighbors, and cherish our values. Let us weave these sturdy threads into a new American community..."

We cannot forget, of course, that the strongest reason for an arts presence in our communities has to do with the human spirit. Art begins in the individual imagination. Who knows how? Perhaps as a consequence of a dream or an overheard conversation or the slanting light of a winter's afternoon or the movement of children at play. From the individual imagination of one creative thinker -- the artist -- the idea blossoms, and the artist creates a dance, a poem, a play, a melody, a painting, and new design.

The second step in the process of creation moves from inspiration to collaboration. The artist involves others in the excitement of the idea and in its execution. This brings into play other artists and the facilitators who provide the possibilities from production, exhibition, dissemination. We don't lock up our paintings in the attic. We don't tell our stories only to ourselves, therein lies madness. Drama and dances, song and sculpture demand the involvement of others, indeed exist because of our need to communicate, our need to know ourselves individually and collectively.

The third step is the promotion of the art piece -- which brings in the media, salespeople, marketing folks. You've come up with this great idea, created the art, collaborated with others to make it happen -- and now, you've got to spread the word. You find ways to get people into the theater, the festival, the museum, the symphony hall, the bookstores, the marketplace.

Step four is interaction between artist and audience. At a theater, or space in galleries and museums, or in books for poems, stories and novels -- there is a point of interaction between artist and audience, a point in the process of art where one artist's idea and vision are received by other human beings. This final step is as crucial as its predecessors, for it is the audience that makes art great. As Walt Whitman said, "To have great poets, there must be great audiences, too."

What I am trying to describe here is a process -- a process of great art and great audiences. The government, either on the federal or state level, cannot call a great artist into being. By the same token, we cannot make people go to the theater, read books, listen to music, spend time at the museum. We cannot create the great audiences by force. What we can do -- at the Arts Endowment and at the state level -- is provide the seed money to help the creative process along. We can help arts organizations reach out to their communities. We can get arts education on every school's curriculum and build the audience of tomorrow, as well as give the child of today a skill and the self-esteem that goes with it. We can show every person how the arts have the power to change lives. Let me tell you two stories I've picked up on my travels that I think speak directly to the issue of building communities and shaping values.

One of my first visits to western Pennsylvania where I had the chance to tour the Manchester Craftsmen's Guild in Pittsburgh, which is a place where young people from poor neighborhoods are taught and mentored through the arts after school. The Manchester Craftsmen's Guild is the brainchild of Bill Strickland, who grew up in the largely African American and poor community on the city's northside.

As a child, Bill had an inspiring public school teacher, a potter who introduced him to the potters wheel and to clay. The experience was transforming, startling, and Bill knew a profound change had come upon him. He describes a sort of a mental picture that developed about kids and clay, about arts and life. And because of that picture he created a program in the mid-60's in a town that was literally on fire. Bill talked about the riots. People were dying. The Black Panthers were on one corner, and he was on the other with a potter's wheel and a box of clay. "My vision," Bill said, "was that I was going to take these children, make a middle class, and ship them off the island of Martha's Vineyard."

That didn't happen, but a lot of children's lives were indeed saved through the arts, including, Bill Strickland's. From the late '60s and early '70s, he worked with ex-steel worker, African American people, and single parents teaching them about pottery, and he soon expanded into classes on photography and other arts, how to market art, and sometimes, how to read. The Manchester Craftsmen's Guild grew up through the National Endowment for the Arts. He applied for grants from our Expansion Arts Program. With the support of the city and with the imprimatur of the Endowment, he was able to attract the attention of other funding sources, including the corporate leaders of Pittsburgh, such as the Heinz Company. The Guild has survived and flourished, and it continues to give people hope through hard work and imagination. Eighty percent of its graduates go on to college. The Guild is a small island of hope in a city desperately optimistic.

Bill Strickland says that "Art is ultimately not an intellectual experience, it is a life experience. It has to do with the way people live seven days a week. It is a way of saving lives and enriching everyone's life." That's what the Arts Endowment is really about. Without it, the city of Pittsburgh would be poorer, the nation's would be poorer.

My other story is also about the singular vision of a dedicated individual, and this tale comes from the inner city of New Orleans. Several years ago, Jana Napoli, a painter, set up shop in a downtown art gallery. She was across the street from an industrial school where young, directionless kids from all over New Orleans came to put in their time -- which tended to be spent hanging around her gallery rather than sitting in school.

So Jana decided to put them to work. She thought that they could learn about the arts -- design and composition and color. With a few friends and some of the students, she salvaged half-used housepaint and discarded wooden furniture on the streets. She taught them how to repair it and then told them to free their imaginations and paint it -- anything at all, be creative. The children began to see their future. They painted dreams and wild designs, they painted from their own pent-up visions, and soon enough, they began to sell their work from Jana's Gallery.

Over time, the nascent organization -- Young Artists/Young Aspirations -- YA/YA -- became a success; about a dozen of these inner city student artists were even featured in national news magazines; they've traveled to Italy, paying their own way through what they sold. Twenty percent of the profits goes to the gallery; 40 percent to the student, and 40 percent for the student's education. Some have gone on to careers in design; all are required to go on to college, that's part of the deal. And that is Jana's dream of community -- to use the arts to empower those young men and women, to give them a sense of self-determination and self-accomplishment. To give them pride.

These two people are heroes to me and to their communities. Working at the grassroots level, they have transformed communities, given people hope, and made the arts come alive. You may have never heard of Bill Strickland or Jana Napoli, but there are hundreds, perhaps thousands of people like them who do the hard work of making the arts a presence in our lives and those of our children. And what have the arts done for those communities, those children? Changed their lives.

The arts gives up hope, they move us, teach us, give voice to our imagination. The poet Samuel Hazo calls that "a voice that is common to all of us -- a voice not intended for multitudes, but for each of us in our individual and irreplaceable selves." That is the power of our product. The arts belong to and speak to our commonality and to our individuality.

Art is a part of the daily life of every schoolboy who reads stories and dreams of becoming a writer, of every schoolgirl who dances or performs on stage and dreams of a life in the ballet or the theater, as I did as a little girl. Everyone with even a little imaginations realizes that art matters to all of our lives, every day. Art is absolutely essential to those children who use community arts centers as an outlet for their creativity, as a place to hang out with friends, as a haven from the street reality of crime, violence and drugs. Let us offer children places of hope where they can turn away from the despair of the streets -- the crime, the unemployment, the drugs.

The National Endowment for the Arts is working with other federal agencies -- the Department of Education, the new Corporation for National Service, Housing and Urban Development, the Justice Department -- to explore ways that we can use the arts to give hope, the heal, to provide alternatives to crime and despair. President Clinton is looking at holistic approaches to solving problems, and the arts are part of the solution to social problems. As the President said, we need to give our children something to say "yes" to. Give them the arts, let them say yes to life through the arts. The young man who picks up a clarinet or a paintbrush or a fistful of clay is not likely to pick up a gun or a needle. He's got better things to do. He's hooked on art.

I have been traveling across the United States, speaking with a variety of audiences, and part of my mission is to turn around the public image of the Arts Endowment, and I hope that our friends in Congress can renew the belief that while government cannot cure all of society's ills, it can help create a climate where art, culture, inquiry and expression are encouraged and supported.

My second goal is to engage individuals in the cultural life of their communities and to outline how the arts can lead the way to an American renewal, community by community. If "all politics is local," as Tip O'Neill said, all change is local, too. One person -- a Bill Strickland or a Jana Napoli -- can make a difference. The people of Wisconsin have that same power.

In a report called Building Community, Ernest Boyer writes, "Art, if it is to build community, must be relevant to all. Citizens of all races and all ages must be engaged in and supportive of the programs." The report recommends that a city or state, its leadership, its business and people ratify a commitment to the arts, connect the arts with the schools, expand financial support for the arts, build networks among a community's arts institutions, broaden the audience for the arts, and shape the future by building community.

Community renewal is all about partnerships: a strong and active local government, the state government, the federal government, businesses, and people in their neighborhoods -- you. Here in Wisconsin, the Arts Board is committed to partnership, and the results are tangible. First, there is a Federal/state partnership. The National Endowment for the Arts supports a wide range of excellent arts activity all across your state. In the past fiscal year, the Arts Endowment awarded 49 grants totaling over $1.75 million to Wisconsin artists and arts organizations. Among those grants were five awards totalling $825,300 for our direct partnership with the Wisconsin Arts Board. These grants help the Arts Board award over 300 grants a year and, specifically, to support arts education, to undertake an initiative to stabilize culturally diverse arts organizations in inner city Milwaukee, to apprentice young artists to master folk artists, to establish a grassroots network of local arts agencies in rural and underserved areas, and to produce cassette packages of "Down Home Dairyland," a radio series of traditional music performed throughout the state.

In turn, the State Arts Board has forged partnerships with other arts and cultural providers to strengthen the overall impact of the arts for the people of Wisconsin. Those partners include Wisconsin businesses and foundations, local arts agencies throughout the state, Wisconsin Arts and Humanities, the Wisconsin Humanities Council, the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, the Wisconsin Academy of Sciences, and the University of Wisconsin, which is, by the way, home to the oldest arts administration program in the country. On Wisconsin!

But perhaps the most important partner in Wisconsin is you, the state legislature, and the people you represent. To insure the economic future of Wisconsin in a technological age, to solve the problems of our towns, our schools, our neighborhoods, we need to roll up our sleeves and work together. Many of the problems are a symptom of a crisis of spirit, for the illness is despair, and the arts offer hope, awakening imagination and encouraging discovery of our inner voice, of the neighbors' point of view, of a new way of looking at the world around us.

Later today, after a stop of two at arts programs here in Madison, I'll be off to Western Wisconsin to get an idea of what's on the minds of people in La Crosse and environs. I suspect that their concerns will find echo here, for every citizen of Wisconsin -- from the Hmong American to the German American to the Norwegian American -- is part of the Wisconsin Idea. As your Senate President, Brian Rude, and Assembly Speaker, Walter Kunicki, wrote to me:

The Wisconsin Idea was to extend the educational and cultural opportunities of the University to all the people of the state. The reasons for this were: to relate art to people's everyday lives, to develop the native talents of the region, to create a favorable climate in which regional expression can grow, and to help break down the barriers between the rural and the urban.

This credo speaks volumes, and it is the work of the Wisconsin Arts Boards to make the Wisconsin Idea a reality. Over the past seven years, you have seen the wisdom behind funding the arts, and I ask you to continue to support the Idea, the Arts Board, and the cultural life of this wonderful state and its good people.

Thank you."
